Birth of a Poem

Out of this sickness silent words ooze painfully – forced from a dumb throat, parched mouth, tongue black and swollen –

lambent pearls formed
in an unberable itch
of sand.

Small grains grudgingly trickle out – laminated over and over again
and polished by a weeping agony.

Trapped in its dark oyster shell, the poem needs someone to let the light in,
prize it loose,

allow the pearls
their glow.

Paddy Webb